Learning a language

Many people believe that the best way to learn a language is to study as much grammar and vocabulary as possible. While these are important, knowing the rules of a language does not necessarily mean that someone can use it confidently in real situations.

Regular practice is particularly important. Speaking with other people, listening to authentic conversations and reading about subjects that interest you can help make new language more familiar. Making mistakes is also a natural part of the process. In fact, learners who are willing to make mistakes often become more confident because they are not afraid to experiment with new language.

For this reason, effective language learning usually involves a combination of study and practical use.
